The Editors of Metroeconomica believe that the present debate among conflicting ideas and theories should be encouraged and their supporters offered an international forum. They take a special interest in classical and post-Keynesian approaches but also welcome innovative work based on neoclassical methodology. They solicit papers which envisage economic systems as processes that take place within specific institutional settings and encourage analyses concerning the roles of uncertainty and of social norms. The journal further invites discussions of economic problems related to current policy issues.

Economic Development and Cultural Change

Letting you examine various aspects of the development process

Founded in 1952, EDCC was the first journal to examine the relation of non-economic variables to the development process. Each issue brings you new research results and economic studies, presentations and analyses of data, assessments of public policy, and book reviews to keep you attuned to new publications.

Bringing you incisive research from various perspectives

EDCC stimulates your work with articles from a wide range of disciplines. Written by scholars and by professionals in nonacademic environments, articles in EDCC provide you with insights from such fields as economics, social psychology, demography, anthropology, sociology, planning, political science, and agricultural economics.

Helping you identify new approaches for your own work

Integrating concepts of social change with economic theories, EDCC examines the economic and social forces that affect development—and the impact of development on culture. As you read EDCC, you’ll discover ideas and methodologies that have applications to your own work.
