

Health Policy and Planning

Editors: P. Vaughan
and G. Walt

Health Policy and Planning is concerned with the issues in health policy, planning, management and evaluation, and focuses on these issues in the developing world. The journal is intended for people working in health care and in such organizations as ministries of health and planning centres, universities, faculties of medicine and schools of public health, and multilateral, bilateral and non-governmental international agencies. The journal is particularly relevant to those working in international health, planning, medical care and public health, but should also have appeal for readers outside the health sector in such fields as social policy and community development.

The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy came into existence in 1976 when the fields of bioethics and the philosophy of medicine were in statu nascendi. It was initially sponsored by the Society for Health and Human Values and sustained primarily by North American readers and authors. But now, over a decade later, bioethics and the philosophy of medicine have become fields of research and teaching around the world. The Journal's associations have grown so that it now has connections with the European Society for Philosophy of Medicine and Health Care and the Japanese Association for Philosophical and Ethical Research in Medicine; the Editorial Advisory Board has taken on an international character. In 1989 The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy expanded to a bimonthly from a quarterly. The need for a scholarly vehicle encompassing the international scope of contemporary research, accommodating the scholar's writing on the subject and covering the topics that are now of daily concern is filled by The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy.
