Volume 29, no. 3:

Noah Arjomand offers an intimate portrait of a young man about to enter the Turkish military; Sara L. Friedman examines the contested legal terrain of intimate recognition in Taiwan; Kimberly A. Arkin explores the power of the idea of national homogeneity for those on a nation’s margins; Harel Shapira talks to Arlie Hochschild about Right Wing politics in America; Kevin Lewis O’Neill explains how Pentecostal pastors in Guatemala City use digital media to trap drug users; Georgina Ramsay considers control over time as a technique of sovereignty in the resettlement of refugees; Dorien Zandbergen takes the question of Smart City politics to the empirical level; and more . . .
Call for Contributions

Public Culture aims to publish original research of the highest caliber, and we welcome your submissions. We value strong writing, clear argumentation, imaginative theory, and an engaging prose style. Public Culture reaches an audience that transcends scholarly disciplines and extends beyond the academy. We seek work that persuades through evidence, logic, and analysis and that presumes no shared theoretical proclivities, political values, or specialized vocabularies.

Brief opinion-oriented pieces (of 500–3,000 words) run at the front of each issue in the Forum section. Full-length articles (of 6,000–9,000 words) based on original research are at the core. We also feature in-depth discussions with leading contemporary thinkers. Typically, we are familiar only with scholarly labor’s final results, published books and articles, or occasional lectures. The interviews we publish call attention to the backstage of intellectual practice. In addition to original research essays, opinion pieces, and conversations, Public Culture welcomes translations of previously published, groundbreaking essays.

Our sister publication, Public Books (www.publicbooks.org), welcomes proposals for review essays about books (fiction or nonfiction), films, exhibitions, or plays, as well as profiles of intellectuals or literary scenes, visual essays, and multimedia work. Authors interested in submitting to Public Books should send proposals of 500 words or fewer to editorial@publicbooks.org.
