Revisioning History
Film and the Construction of a New Past
Edited by Robert A. Rosenstone

In Revisioning History historians from around the world look at the historical film on its own terms, not as it compares to written history but as a unique way of recounting the past. Each of the thirteen contributors looks at an example of New History cinema—films that make a serious effort to come to grips with the past. Most of the essays that appear in this unique book have not been published before. Together they break new ground.

"Robert Rosenstone has assembled a group of first-class historians who are concerned both about writing good history and making good films. . . . Revisioning History will be a boon for students of history and film both. . . ."—Natalie Zemon Davis

Colonialism's Culture
Anthropology, Travel, and Government
Nicholas Thomas

In a wide-ranging account of the development of ideas about human difference, Nicholas Thomas challenges reigning theories that portray colonialism as monolithic in character, purpose, and efficacy throughout the world. Taking issue with such writers as Edward Said, Homi Bhabha, and Gayatri Spivak, Thomas describes colonialism not so much as a discourse but a project—a project in which the interactions among colonizing and colonized people are far more variable and reveal greater ambivalence than generally imagined.

"It takes courage to declare that almost all studies of colonialism up to this point have suffered from shortcomings which this book will begin to remedy. . . . This book should be read widely in fields ranging from anthropology and history to comparative literature and cultural studies."—Johannes Fabian, University of Amsterdam

Displacements
Cultural Identities in Question
Edited by Angelika Bammer
These essays examine the effects of leaving one's native culture or experiencing the imposition of a colonizing culture. In questioning the "us"/"them" opposition, Displacements explores the meanings of "family," "native," "home," "community," and "citizenship" in our shifting political and conceptual landscapes.

The term “diaspora” evokes powerful images of exile and longing. It has been used since antiquity to designate the dispersion of Greeks, Jews, and Armenians. Recently, new polities ranging from the African-American and Ukrainian-Canadian to the Chinese-American, the Quebecois, and the Palestinian have entered the semantic domain diasporas share with exile and ethnic communities, immigrants, expatriates, refugees, and guest workers.

The first journal devoted solely to the study of diasporas and their cultural, political, and historical ramifications, Diaspora publishes contributions from the disciplines of history, literature, political science, cultural studies, anthropology, religious studies, sociology, economics, linguistics, psychology, geography, and musicology.

American Literary History

Through essays, position papers, and commentaries, along with reviews, interviews, and previously unpublished diaries, letters, and stories, American Literary History surveys the contested field of US culture four times a year. No other journal offers such a wide-ranging and provocative discussion of critical challenges. Each issue takes up questions of vital concern to a generation of scholars in the midst of reinterpreting the American cultural scene from its origins to the present.

ALH has become the premier forum for a rich and varied criticism shaping the ways we have come to think about America and setting the agenda of American cultural studies for years to come.

NATURALIZING POWER

A Feminist Cultural Analysis

Edited by Sylvia Yanagisako and Carol Delaney

This collection of essays analyzes relations of social inequality that appear to be logical extensions of a "natural order," and in the process demonstrates that a revitalized feminist anthropology of the 1990s has much to offer the field of feminist theory. Fashioned as a response to the lack of cultural analysis in feminist scholarship, the contributors question the category of gender within the inclusive context of the structural dynamics of inequality. They also examine how cultural identities, domains and institutions affect our perception of gender in society.

Michael Omi and Howard Winant

"Omi and Winant's Racial Formation in the United States presents a striking and original analysis of race, social structure and power. The second edition is thought-provoking and challenging. This book is an invaluable critique of the limits and contradictions inherent in racial identity, social analysis and politics. Omi and Winant are among our most important social critics on issues of race and class writing in the U.S. today."

JOURNAL OF NEAR EASTERN STUDIES

More than a century of experience

Established by William Rainey Harper in 1884, Journal of Near Eastern Studies continues to bring its readers the current research being done by scholars of ancient Near and Middle Eastern civilizations. As the only journal devoted exclusively to this field, JNES is in the position to provide its readers with a multidisciplinary perspective. The articles in JNES will help you keep up with the latest theories and research by covering such topics as archaeology, art, history, literature, linguistics, religion, law, and science as well as Old Testament and Islamic studies. The result is a broad, lively portrayal of the ancient Near East from internationally renowned scholars from a variety of disciplines.

A twice-yearly, internationally oriented scholarly periodical, Arena Journal will continue a commitment of the first series of Arena to publishing material which reflects on a renewed left critical practice. It is a place for theoretically and ethically concerned discussion on the prospects for co-operation within contemporary life.

Arena Journal will respond to the challenges of the last twenty years to the 'classical' accounts of social life which have emerged from theories of subjectivity and the sign, challenges which have affected the status of figures such as Marx, Weber and Durkheim, as well as post-classical theorists such as Habermas and Giddens. A central focus of the Journal is upon the interpretive and technical intellectual practices and their relation to the reconstruction of social processes: class relations, forms of selfhood and community life. We welcome contributions from various perspectives which engage with the Journal's special concerns.
