Contributors

Drucilla Cornell is professor of political science, women’s studies, and comparative literature at Rutgers University, professor extraordinaire at the University of Pretoria, South Africa, and a visiting lecturer at Birkbeck College in London. She has published widely in feminist, legal, and critical theory. Her most recent book is Law and Revolution in South Africa: uBuntu, Dignity, and the Struggle for Constitutional Transformation (Fordham University Press).

J. Martin Daughtry is an assistant professor of ethnomusicology at NYU. His research centers on sound studies, post-Soviet musical nationalism, the phenomenology of voice, and the sonic dimension of warfare. His monograph The Amplitude of Violence: Listening through a War and Its Aftermath is forthcoming from Oxford University Press.

Chrisoula Lionis is an adjunct associate lecturer at the National Institute for Experimental Arts, University of New South Wales, Australia. She works on the Australian national Palestinian Film Festival and recently curated the exhibition Beyond the Last Sky: Contemporary Palestinian Photography and Video (Australian Centre for Photography, 2012).

Derek Pardue is a visiting assistant professor of anthropology at Wesleyan University. He is the author of Brazilian Hip Hoppers Speak from the Margin (Palgrave). His current book project Creole Citizenship is forthcoming from University of Illinois Press.

Stephen D. Seely is a doctoral candidate in women’s and gender studies at Rutgers University. His dissertation, “A Technics of Sexual Difference,” explores the relationship between sex/uality and technicity in philosophy, psychoanalysis, the biological and techno-sciences, and science fiction. Additionally, he has published articles on queer becoming, affect theory, race and psychoanalysis, sexual difference, and biophilosophy.